Thrilling Experience of a West Virginla Hunter.

Desperate Struggle for Life of a Hig Hisel Rear-Slightly Hit by a Rullel, She tirapples With Har Would-He Slayer.

PARRESSERRO, W. Va., Mny 20,-leaned W. Cool, an old hunter and furmer of Wobster Coucty, a few days since killed a large black bear which weighed over 380 pounds. Mr. Cool was aquirral-hunting, and had nothing with him but a squirrel gua and a couple of smell squirrel dogs. Coul had just shot a squirrel, which foll out of a sail trea at his feet, when one of the degs rushed lute a clump of undergrowth and began to burk vicionaly. The other dog, attracted by the nois; followed other deg, attracted by the nois; followed the first one, and in a mement out rushed a big blank bear directly toward Cool. The bruto was growling and snapping violently ather small anlagonists, who dodged the blows and bites, snapping hor by the blad leg; whose tret they found an exercise. over they found an epening. Cool, who had not yet been observed by the bear, quickly loaded his gun and fired at the imar's hasd. The hullet struck lar, but did not seem to injure ber very hedly, no the bear turned and rushed toward the hunter. Not having time to reiend, Cool clubbed his gun, and just as the bear raised to her hind feat struck her a vicious blow on the bead. The blow knocked the bear backward, but sha quickly regainst her feet and again come at the hunter in deadly rage. When Cool again struck at the bear she naickiy warded aff the blow with one of ber for paws and made a savaga blow at him with tha other. The beer's claws tore through the bunter's shirt and made fire long gashes down bis bleast, the cuts pene-trating, some of them at least, half- an inch. The force of the blow knocked the bear pounced upon him would have tora him into the behind, enapping and hiting until they had ribbons but for the lively attack of the dogs, which seized the ferucious brute hy one of her hind legs, and victority anapped their tooth lets thism. The bear whirled around and made a dash at the degs, which oasly evaded har, running in front and ilecoyed her several yards distant from Cool. The huntar teaded his gua as quickly as possible and advanced toward the hear which whirled around and again advanced npon blm. Just as the maintal get within two or three springs of him Cool took rapid aim and shot her between the eyes, killing her instantly. After killing the bear Cool, although badly hurt, went into the thicket with its dags, and by their aid found two piump culic curled upunder a fallen tree. They were about as large as a common house cat. The hunter picked them up and went to his bome, whea he put them into a small pen, witch he proposes to keep them until Infl, when he will kill and eat them. FORESTRY FOR FARMERS.

in Infelligent Estimate of Varieties of Trees For Different Purposes.

The high price which black walnut lumber has brought for a few years swesthem a living. has set the anthluking to planting it largely, when in fact it is one of the peorest possible trees for general utilty, and on many soils is not a rapid grower. The black walnuts now being marketed at a price which makes a single log pay for an aere of land, were in the nut stage about the time the Pilgrims landed, and are materially different in size and quality from the spongy growth of thirty or even fifty years, and the farmer who would dabble In forestry for the benefit of the next following generation can scarcely do worse than plant the black walnut. For the analler uses of the farm-such as hamlles and whillletrees-the shell hark hickory is excellent. It thrives in many kinds of soil, and under cultiwill reach a diameter of five inches, three feet from the ground, in twenty years, from the seed. For strength, elast lelty and finish secondgrowth blekory excels any other known wood. For the larger hardwood repairs on the farm-such as wagon-poles and reaches, levers, wagon and sled stakes and doubletroes-the white ash is the most desirable tree a farmer can plant. It is rapid in growth and the wood is tough, elastle and durable when painted. It will sprout from the stump after outting, and thus indefinitely continue the plantation, once estaidshed. It seems to thrive equally well in clay or gravely loam, and is readily raised

For fenelng, there is no rapid-grow ing tree so good as the sweet American chestnnt, but it does not seem to thrive on prairie solls or heavy limestone clays, its natural home being the sandy ridges underlyld by conglomerate. Tho durability of chestnut timber either lu or out of the ground is second only to red cedar, and I wonder that more farmers do not start plantations of this valuable wood. On a farm near whera I live are chestnut rails still doing duty in a fence that were split in 1815; and the other day I took out a greenhouse post of second-growth chestnut that had done service for eighteen years, and for an ordinary fence I think It would have lasted ten years longer. In localities, where the chestnut dues not thrive I would plant the vollow locust. whileh is so generally well known. The only objection is its liability to injury by the borer, and I have no doubt that some means will be devised to head off this pest, when there is a general demand for such a remedy. For profit other than its timber value I believe II will pay to put out sugar-maple groves. On good salls, if not planted too close (say forty trees per acre), trees will do io tap at thirty years from planting, and probably for 100 years thereafter. Toward tho cluse of the decade ending with 1860 there was quite a boom in street-tree planting throughout Northern Ohio, and in some countles premiums were offered by agrl cultural societies for the best row of twenty-live maple trees planted by one individual. Many of hese trees are now from twelve to eighteen inches diameter, and on some farms have been tapped three or four thnes. When planted most of them were about one and one-half inches diameter, and were taken from the woods, the top being cut off at a sullable height. Had smaller trees from a leneerow or nursery, with better roots. been planted, probably nearly all would have lived, justeau of less than twentylive per cent., and the trees would have been as large or larger now. The maple is natural to dairy regions, and in such sections young trees can generally be had for the digging. The planting and staking of a few acres of pasture would cost but little, as it could be done in early spring, and the pasturing value of the grannil would be but slightly impaired for at least two-thirds of the time it would take to get the trees to a sugaring-producing age. The most profitable part of many dalry farms is the sugar-bush, the labor of which is mostly performed when nothing else can be done, and it seems to mo that it would be wiso to extend the maple orchard for the benefit of another generation .- L. B. Pierce, in N. Y. Tribune. PLOWING BY STEAM.

It Cuts a Very Small Figure in Agricult tural Work. The first steam plow made in Amerlea was patented in 1833 by E. C. Bellinger, of South Carolina, but It was not successful in operation. The first steam plow that was successfully used in the lield was patented by Mr. Heathcoto, of England, In 1832. This plow was used to some extent, but at a trial in 1837 for a prize that had been offered for a successful implement of this kind. It was adjudged too embersomo and dillientt to work. After this other sleam-plows were patented, of which the most sneeessful was that of Mr. Fowler, patented in 1854, and again in 1864. Another successful Invention was the Howard sleam-plow. There were sald to be in 1870 over one thousand steam-plows in use in Great Britain, and numbers had been sent to the East and West Indies, and Egypt, and also to South Africa, Australia and Canada. The application of steam to plowing was but slowly accomplished in this country, owing probably to the fact that few of our furmers have sufilclent equital to try these inventions. The wealthy merchant, A. T. Stewart, had a steam engine for plowing made In England for use on his estate on Long Island. An improvement on this engine was devised and patented by Mr. Hinsdale, an American, and has been since used successfully, not only for plows, but for threshing-machines, unllis and pumps. Two of the largest engines ever used for plowlag were nucle about 1870 by Fowler & Co., of England, for Mr. Effingham, the owner of a large plantation about fifty miles south of New Orleans. Of lale years this invention has been steadily gaining ground. Improvements of much value have been made, and yet taking the country as a whola the use of steam

VALUE OF DRAINAGE. Why It l'ays to Drain Bry Land Under All

The past two years of drought, and the protense of some unwise writers that the drought was caused by the tile drainage, has greatly demoralized the business. It will take some time to recover. But it will again resume its place in good farm improvements. It is n benefit to the farm in any kind of a season, too wet, too dry, or medium. It prepares the soil to stand better the extremes of the seasons. Plants mostly get their molsture from the ground, and it is botter brought up by expillary attraction whom the soil is rendered lonso and porous by underground the drainage. And underdrains are ten times hetter than open ditches to iake the surplus water off. When the water passes through the soll to the drain. there is no loss of fertilizing material by washing, and the ground will be found ready for tlliage in a few henrs after the heaviest rains. In case of tile drainage the soil will eatch up and retain for plant foul all that the fall of snow or rain always brings to the earth. The the drain three feet deep and twenty feet apart, with a fall of two luches to the one hundred feet, will work wonders in nearly all classes of land. This is not necessarlly confined to land too wet for entityation. It pays to drain stry land, so that the water will pass through and enrich the soil instead of taking off by surface water the fertilizing gases brought down by rain front the atmosphere, as well as the artificial fertilizers applied by the provident farmer. Let no variety of roasons stop the grand work of drainage, and never listen to the foolish man who charges drought to such work. -Des Moines (la.) Register.

Food for Young Chicks. As feed for young chicks, boiled rice and outmost are very good; but as they are sticky it is hest to silr in dry cornmeal or some other dry moal, to make it easier to eal. All soft food for chicks should be so dry as to crumble wher dropped. Soft, watery mosses should be avoided. Feed chicks when young four times s day, and as soon as they can run around well a feeding coop of laths on three sides, the fourth one being of boards, should be placed on each spot where there are several coops of chicks. The spaces between the laths should be large enough to admit the chicks only. Turn the boarded side to the south, to keep the sun off the food, which should be placed inside. so that the chicks can get it when they please. This should be cracked corn or wheat; the wheat is much the better, but only enough of all should be given, as they will ent up cleau each time .-Bural New Yorker.

New Egg-Preserving Process.

"A new process of preserving eggs a reporter, "and it is going to have an inportant effect on the trade," The speaker then opened an egg that looked fresh without and within, and explained that it had been laid months before and subjected to the new treatment invented by a resident of Copenhagen. The process consists in subeeting the eggs to a carbonic acid bath. They are kept in a hermeticallysealed tank that is filled with earbould aeld, and not taken out until they are to be placed on the market. The eggs subjected to this trentment show a sharply-defined yelk and an unchanged white. Eggs preserved by a coating of lime do not maintain this condition. Carbonic acid tanks can be made especially for shipment and eggs thus preserved can be sent on long voyages -N. Y. Mail and Express.
